D. LEARNING OUTCOMES (General)

1. become familiar with basic trends in United States history since 1877, also in critical thinking using historical methods.
2. become acquainted with the general themes, issues, and events of the period so they can analyze and evaluate the shape of American development.
3. develop reading, writing, and analytical skills.
4. read for comprehension of an argument rather than merely for information, i.e., how to understand an argument (thesis), how to recognize evidence, and how the two are related.
5. work on constructing an argument (thesis) and organizing evidence effectively to support that idea.
6. recognize how visual material, such as photos, paintings, and maps, can be used as evidence for historical analysis.
7. will learn to recognize five characteristics that define historical thinking:
   1) Change over time--the world of your grandparents differs from yours.
   2) Context--to place people, along with their actions and ideas, within a larger framework that shapes and defines their view of the world.
   3) Causality--the reason(s) something happened.
   4) Contingency--nothing in history is predetermined; people make decisions that cause something to happen, producing results that might be good, bad, or ugly; thus, the future is up for grabs.
   5) Complexity--life is messy!
